Cold plunge on the way

17 October 2003

The pleasant warm and dry Autumn weather, over much of the country, looks set to be replaced by much lower temperatures and an early taste of winter, with a risk of snow in some areas, Met Office forecasters are warning.

There is a risk of sleet or wet snow, particularly in the north of England and Scotland, from Monday onwards. Further south there is only a small chance - 15% in London.

Nigel Reed, Head of Operations, said: "Even though the chance of snow in London is small, everyone will notice the change to much colder weather, especially given the exceptionally warm weather over the summer and early Autumn."
